This study evaluated the behavioral effects of ipsapirone, a selective 5-HT_{1A} receptor agonist, using a battery of behavioral tests in rodents. In the hot plate test, ipsapirone (2.5-10 mg/kg) was not active. However, 5-HT (10 mg/kg) produced a marked reduction in response latencies. In the vibrissal hair-clipping test, ipsapirone (5-10 mg/kg) was inactive. The highest dose of ipsapirone (10 mg/kg) increased head twitch counts to a greater extent than did fluoxetine (10 mg/kg). The 5-HT_{1A} receptor agonist, (+/-)-6-chloro-2-methyl-1-phenyl-1,2,3,4-tetrahydroisoquinoline, increased head twitch counts to a similar extent as ipsapirone. In the elevated plus maze, ipsapirone (1 mg/kg) produced an increase in the percentage of time spent on open arms. In the open field test, ipsapirone (10 mg/kg) and (+/-)-6-chloro-2-methyl-1-phenyl-1,2,3,4-tetrahydroisoquinoline (1 mg/kg) increased the distance traveled in the center of the field and decreased the distance traveled in the periphery. The results are discussed with regard to the possible therapeutic role of ipsapirone in the treatment of certain types of anxiety. This research project is intended to provide a detailed analysis of the most frequently used anesthetic technique, the lumbar epidural, in an attempt 82157476af
